Pass and Security Clearance Data for the Executive Office of the President

	The Honorable William F. Clinger, Jr. Chairman, Committee on Government Reform and Oversight House of Representatives
	The Honorable Frank R. Wolf The Honorable Porter J. Goss House of Representatives
	You asked us to review the White House's procedures for access passes and security clearances issued since January 20, 1993. Because of reported delays of over a year in issuing passes, you expressed concerns about how the White House was managing the access pass and security clearance processes. As agreed with your offices, this report presents our (1) analysis of the steps in the access pass approval process for 1993 and 1994 and (2) observations on internal controls over the access pass and security clearance processes.
Background	One of the ways the Secret Service protects the President and other senior officials is the use of a system of access passes to the White House complex. According to the Secret Service, about 7,000 people have passes officials is the use of a system of access passes to the White House complex. According to the Secret Service, about 7,000 people have passes allowing access to the White House complex, which includes the White House, the Old Executive Office Building, and the New Executive Office Building. The number varies daily and includes members of the press, military personnel, Secret Service employees, as well as employees of the Executive Office of the President, detailees from other government agencies, volunteers, contractor employees, and residence staff. Our review covers staff and contractors from selected offices of the Executive Office of the President, totaling 638 individuals.

The various types of White House access passes¹ fall into two categories—temporary passes, which are issued initially for 90 days and can be extended beyond the initial period, and permanent passes. The process, as first documented in March 1994, for obtaining a temporary access pass requires employees to ¹The Secret Service identified 35 different types of access passes, including several for access to the White House, several for access to the Old Executive Office Building, several for access to the New Executive Office Building, and 3 for members of the press to gain access to limited parts of the White House complex.

- complete and submit required paperwork, including the Questionnaire for Sensitive Positions Form (Standard Form (SF)-86) and
- undergo limited background checks by the Secret Service and the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI).

The process for obtaining a permanent access pass generally requires the following:

- The relevant Executive Office of the President security office reviews the required paperwork and forwards it to the FBI.
- The FBI conducts a background investigation.
- The Executive Office of the President reviews the FBI report and other information and determines whether to recommend approval of a permanent pass.
- The Secret Service issues the pass, if it has no objections relating to protective interest issues.

See appendix II for a detailed discussion of the above processes.

The White House allows employees of the White House Office, the Office of the Vice President, and the Office of Policy Development with permanent White House passes and a need-to-know to have access to information classified up to the top secret level. Staff from other offices within the Executive Office of the President grant security clearances under Executive Order 10450, as amended.²

To measure timeliness of the pass process, we analyzed dates in the process for employees who entered on duty between January 20, 1993, and September 16, 1994. These 638 individuals were paid from appropriations available to 5 offices of the Executive Office of the President.³ As agreed with your offices, the scope of our work was to determine the time it took to obtain passes and analyze time intervals for selected steps in the process. The White House explained the reasons for some of the processing times and we incorporated these statements as appropriate. However, we did not evaluate the reasons for time frame delays or the ²Executive Order 10450 provides the basic security standards for agencies to follow. Executive Order 12968, issued on August 4, 1995, updated and revised the government's personnel security program, but did not supersede Executive Order 10450.

³These included employees who were, according to White House officials, on track to receive a permanent pass. The employees included current and former staff, contractors, and detailees who worked for one of the following offices within the Executive Office of the President: the White House Office, the Office of the Vice President, the Office of Policy Development, the Office of Administration, and the Office of National Drug Control Policy. Not included were unpaid volunteers and individuals who were employed for short periods early in the administration.

	White House explanations. Appendix I describes, in detail, the scope and methodology of our review.
Results in Brief	Individuals entering on duty during 1993 received final approval for permanent White House access passes an average of 346 days from their start date, but the average time of approval fell to 98 days for staff entering in 1994. ⁴ According to White House officials, the White House has not historically tracked time interval data related to the access pass process, thus we could not compare the information we analyzed to prior experience.

1993 and 1994 for each process step.

⁴These are the averages for all individuals approved for access passes. In the appendixes, we also discuss averages based on adjustments reflecting cases where an individual deviated from the steps generally followed in the process. For example, an individual may have completed certain paperwork for the process because of prior employment before entering on duty with the Executive Office of the President.

Note: The times for individual steps do not add to the total processing times because not all individuals were involved in every step. Also, no interval is shown for the submission of the SF-86 in 1994 because the SF-86 was signed on average before an individual entered on duty.

The longer time needed to process 1993 entrants was primarily attributable to the time individuals took to complete the SF-86 and to subsequent actions taken by the Executive Office of the President. These actions include the time taken to review the SF-86; and then to review the FBI investigative report and other reports, and recommend that a permanent access pass be approved.

During 1993, there were no written time standards for completing the various access pass processes, except for goals set by the FBI relating to its segment of the process. The White House set a standard in March 1994 that gave each employee 30 days to complete the SF-86. The Treasury, Postal Service and General Government Appropriations Act for 1995 (P.L. 103-329), enacted in September 1994, made this standard a legal requirement and also mandated that, with certain exceptions, an appropriate access pass be recommended for approval within 6 months after a person entered on duty with the Executive Office of the President. The FBI raised its goal for completing background investigations from 45 days to 60 days in late 1994. Although the FBI did not always meet this goal, FBI and Secret Service actions did not substantially add to the processing time in 1993.

	White House and congressional actions have established process changes and controls to improve the access pass and security clearance processes. For the time intervals and offices we reviewed, with few exceptions, the time intervals declined, and the procedures were adhered to. However, our observations indicate a potential for strengthening controls in several selected areas, particularly at the start of a new administration. The areas related to renewing temporary passes, revoking passes after separation, and granting security clearances. The scope of our work did not address whether problems occurred as a result of the potential control weaknesses. While we did not identify specific problems, we believe it is appropriate to consider improving these controls.
Processing Times Were Longer in 1993 Than in 1994	The processing time between when a person entered on duty, obtained a temporary pass, and received Secret Service approval for a permanent pass was substantially shorter in 1994 than in 1993. ⁵ The White House attributed the time reductions in the process to the following reasons: the number of individuals entering on duty decreased in 1994; the White House corrected inefficiencies and implemented computerized tracking; the White House and Congress established time standards; and staff and officials became more experienced with the process. The two steps that most contributed to the lengthy processing time during 1993 were the time taken by employees to submit paperwork and the Executive Office of the President to review it.
Employee Timeliness	The amount of time individuals took to complete the SF-86 after entering on duty was reduced from about 100 days to a few days or less from 1993 to 1994. According to White House officials, this change occurred because
	⁵ Unloss otherwise specified a specific year refers to when an action began, but did not necessarily

 $^{^5}$ Unless otherwise specified, a specific year refers to when an action began, but did not necessarily conclude.

	the White House issued standards in March 1994 that required individuals to submit the sF-86 within 30 days of entering on duty. Public Law 103-329 put this 30-day requirement in law. Prior to these actions, there were no documented Executive Office of the President standards for this part of the process. However, White House officials said that informal standards existed. (See app. III.)
Agency Timeliness	The times needed by the Executive Office of the President to (1) review the sF-86 for completeness before submitting it to the FBI and (2) review the FBI's investigative report and other documentation and recommend to the Secret Service that a permanent pass be issued declined from 1993 to 1994. The second step took 174 days in 1993 and 46 days in 1994.
	The FBI was not always able to meet its goal for conducting background investigations during either 1993 or 1994 and increased its goal from 45 days to 60 days in late 1994. FBI officials cited several reasons for not meeting the goal, including an increased overall caseload and reduced resources.
	The average number of days it took the Secret Service to approve a permanent pass after the Executive Office of the President recommended that a pass be approved decreased from 29 days in 1993 to 7 days in 1994. The Secret Service attributed the 1993 average in part to the Executive Office of the President not promptly sending pass requests to the Secret Service and the 1994 average to the time needed to address questions related to protective interest issues. We analyzed information provided by the Secret Service for 1994 that showed relatively short processing times within the Service, but it was not sufficiently detailed to verify the reasons for delay. Similar data for 1993 were not available. (See app. III.)
Observations on Controls	White House and legislative actions have resulted in a number of process changes and additional controls designed to improve the timeliness of the access pass and security clearance processes. The data we analyzed show that these changes, with few exceptions, are being adhered to. For example, when it was discovered that a career employee had taken longer than the 6 months allowed under Public Law 103-329 to be recommended for a permanent pass, the Executive Office of the President initiated action to suspend the employee. The issue causing the delay was resolved within a month and a pass was issued. Also, most individuals have complied with a March 14, 1994, Chief of Staff directive to complete the sF-86 within a specified time, up to 30 days, although 11 did not. As described below, we have several observations on potential opportunities to strengthen controls.

First, we noted that the White House procedures and legislative provisions recognize the possibility of delays beyond employee or Executive Office of the President control, such as reviews by other agencies taking several months to complete. Additional attention may be warranted to strengthen controls when it is necessary to renew temporary access passes in these situations. Temporary passes give people access to the White House complex while they wait for a permanent pass and are usually issued to individuals within a few days of when they enter on duty. Temporary passes are usually issued for 90 days but may be extended in 30-day increments. Individuals included in our analysis held temporary passes for an average of 341 days prior to obtaining final approval for a permanent pass in 1993 and for 110 days in 1994. Our discussions with Secret Service officials and our analyses indicated that during the longer processing times in 1993, the Service routinely granted eight or more extensions to individuals for temporary passes as requested by the Executive Office of the President. Secret Service officials stated that during the initial transitions of administrations it was normal to have more frequent extensions. (See app. IV.)

Second, additional attention may be warranted to strengthen controls to ensure that both temporary and permanent passes are revoked when an individual leaves, when appropriate. Of the 638 records we analyzed, 188 (29 percent) show that the individuals had left their designated Executive Office of the President organization. We did not verify whether permanent passes were voided or returned in these cases.⁶ However, the data showed that seven permanent passes were approved by the Secret Service after the person left. In these cases, Secret Service officials said that they either did not know these people had left the Executive Office of the President or were told the person still needed a pass. The Secret Service has no process to verify an individual's continued need for a pass. Secret Service officials stated that they rely on the White House to notify them when an individual leaves or a pass should be terminated. White House officials stated that they monitor arrivals and departures of staff closely and that passes are returned unless retention is justified. We confirmed that the White House has procedures in this area, but we did not discuss specific cases. (See app. IV.)

⁶We used individual records with specific identifying data excluded and thus could not follow up on specific cases.

	Third, procedures may be needed to require interim security clearances for White House Office staff who later receive access to classified information if they hold permanent access passes. Through December 1994, 381 of 638 records we analyzed show that the person had been authorized access to classified information. These included 359 personnel in the White House Office, the Office of the Vice President, and the Office of Policy Development who could have been given access to classified information on a need-to-know basis if they held a permanent White House pass. ⁷ Also, 22 individuals in the Office of Administration and the Office of National Drug Control Policy could have been granted access under Executive Order 10450. The first of the permanent White House passes was not approved until September 30, 1993, and the first of the 22 security clearances was not granted until June 22, 1993. ⁸ We asked how the offices conducted business involving classified information during these 8- and 5-month periods. White House officials stated that about two dozen senior staff received interim clearances during this time. They also stated that the overwhelming majority of the classified work done in the Executive Office of the President is done by the staff of the National Security Council, which is not one of the offices included in the data we analyzed. Procedures for dealing with similar circumstances in future administrations may be needed. (See app. IV.)
Agency Comments and Our Evaluation	In oral comments on a draft of this report, White House officials generally agreed with our statistical analysis. However, they raised concerns about our observations on the potential for strengthening of selected controls. They specifically stated that we had not identified actual problems resulting from these potential weaknesses. We agreed that is the case because the scope of our work did not extend beyond a review of the process. We clarified this point in the report where appropriate.
	Our position is that selected control measures can be improved and not that a specific problem has occurred. For example, we discussed controls over passes and clearances because the procedures we examined indicated the potential for additional internal controls in these areas. Our limited review did not examine either the controls or their effects in-depth, but we believe that the issues warrant consideration. We believe that the need for such controls is most apparent at the beginning of a new administration; thus our discussion of them is not based on the existence of documented problems.

 $^{^7\!\}mathrm{Secret}$ Service officials stated that their procedures for granting access passes do not involve security clearance issues.

 $^{^{8}\}mbox{In}$ addition, one individual had a clearance at the time he entered on duty.

White House officials also suggested several technical corrections, which we made as appropriate.

In oral comments on a draft of this report, Secret Service officials generally agreed with our report. They suggested several technical corrections, which we made as appropriate.

In written comments on a draft of this report, the FBI asked that we clarify certain information. We revised the report to reflect the FBI's comment. (See app. V.)

Unless you publicly announce its contents earlier, we plan no further distribution of this report until 30 days after its issue date. At that time, we will send copies to appropriate congressional committees, the White House Chief of Staff, the Assistant to the President for Management and Administration, the Attorney General, the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Director of the Secret Service, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, and other interested parties. We will make copies available to others on request. If you have any questions concerning this report, please call me on (202) 512-8412. Major contributors to this report are listed in appendix VI.

Appendix I Scope and Methodology

To assess timeliness of processing White House access passes and security clearances, we examined the time intervals associated with each processing step; reviewed the process and associated laws, regulations, policies, and procedures; and interviewed officials from the Executive Office of the President, Secret Service, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), Office of Government Ethics, and Defense Finance and Accounting Service.

To calculate the processing time for passes and clearances, we collected the following key event dates associated with processing steps for staff¹ assigned to the White House Office, Special Assistance to the President (Vice President's Office), Office of Policy Development, Office of Administration, and Office of National Drug Control Policy, on or after January 20, 1993, who were paid with Executive Office of the President appropriated funds and needed a permanent pass.

- 9. Date the permanent pass was issued.⁵
- 10. Date the security clearance was granted.⁶
- 11. Date the person separated, if applicable.

For reasons of confidentiality, the White House provided a number and office designation for individuals covered in our analysis.

⁶Secret Service officials said that this is not part of the access pass process.

¹Staff included long-term contractors, reimbursable detailees (terms of 6 months or more), and consultants, as well as career and political appointment staff needing a permanent pass.

 $^{^2\}mathrm{The}$ SF-50 indicates that a personnel action has been completed; in this case, it relates to the date entered on duty.

³As indicated in appendix III, this is not a formal part of the access pass process.

⁴For this interval, we used the date the Executive Office of the President recommended to the Secret Service that a permanent pass be approved.

⁵For this interval, we used the date the Secret Service approved a permanent pass for issuance.

The White House compiled a database containing an identifier and the key dates, when available,⁷ for each of 638 individuals. Dates were provided for (1) individuals entering on duty as of January 20, 1993, through September 16, 1994, and (2) process steps completed by December 13, 1994. Dates associated with processing steps involving the Secret Service and FBI were supplied to the White House by those agencies. We received the database containing the key event dates from the White House in January 1995 and worked with the White House to correct administrative mistakes found in the database. We also verified a random sample of event dates using original personnel documents and other records.

We analyzed intervals between key event dates to determine average, minimum, and maximum processing times as well as trends over time. We discussed our analyses with White House, Secret Service, and FBI officials to determine reasons for individual processing times and for overall trends. We also discussed procedures and controls over granting access passes and security clearances. In our analyses, we obtained White House explanations of individual cases and overall trends, but we did not further examine supporting documentation for these individual cases, as agreed with the requesters' offices. The effects of the limited examinations are noted in the report where appropriate.

After the database was finalized, White House officials proposed that dates for 54 individuals not be included since they reflected anomalies that skew the analysis.⁸ We agree that these individuals followed a different pattern than the majority of individuals in the database. However, they do represent the actual pass approval process for these individuals; consequently, we present both sets of data in our detailed analyses.

Excluding the 54 individuals, in most instances, increased the average amount of time for an interval. Some individuals received a pass when employed by an office that was not subject to this review. For example, a person who was employed in January 1993 by the Office of Management and Budget, an office not included in our analysis, could have received a permanent pass and then transferred in 1994 to the White House Office. As a result, the record would show a 1994 entered-on-duty date and earlier times for all other key event dates. The effect of this in our analysis is that when the entered-on-duty date is analyzed against the other key event dates, the result is a negative number.⁹ In our overall analyses, we added all the time differences, negative and positive, to calculate an average.

⁷Dates were not always available for such reasons as staff separated before a date was met, contractor staff did not receive an SF-50, drug testing dates were not provided for contractor staff because such tests are administered by contractors and not the Executive Office of the President, and not all staff needed security clearances.

⁸Of the 54, 45 transferred from a position within the Executive Office of the President or another government agency to the position shown in the database, 2 transferred from their position as shown in the database to another office within the Executive Office of the President, 5 were originally 90-day hires that became permanent employees, and 2 had background investigations completed prior to entering on duty. We were not able to determine whether these 54 represented all individuals in these situations.

We conducted our review from May 1994 to August 1995 in accordance with generally accepted government auditing standards.

⁹For example, if an individual entered on duty on January 20, 1994, and signed the SF-86 on January 17, 1994, the difference would be calculated as a –3. The average number of days in the unadjusted database from entering on duty to signing the SF-86 was –52 days, whereas in the adjusted database, the average was 3 days.

Appendix II The Access Pass Process

	This appendix describes the process typically followed by White House complex employees for obtaining a White House access pass and/or security clearance, according to agency procedures that were first issued in March 1994 and the statements of agency officials. This process involved activities related to three generally uniform steps: (1) initiating pre-employment tasks, (2) obtaining a temporary pass, and (3) obtaining a permanent pass. Procedures for employees requiring access to classified information vary by organization. (See app. IV.)
Step 1: Initiating Pre-Employment	The following tasks must be completed concerning each applicant's appointment:
Tasks	 Applicants must undergo a security interview conducted by the relevant Executive Office of the President security office. Applicants must submit to a drug test. It normally takes about 10 days to get the results, and if the test is positive, the person would be disqualified from appointment.¹ Applicants must undergo an initial name check in which their name, date of birth, place of birth, and Social Security number are checked through the Secret Service's Workers, Appointment, and Visitors Entrance System. This consists of checks through four computer databases: the FBI's National Crime Information Center database, a criminal history database, a Secret Service database, and a Washington-area law enforcement database. According to White House officials, the results are usually back within a day. Applicants must undergo a more extensive FBI name check. The Executive Office of the President forwards the person's name and date of birth to the FBI, which checks the name through the FBI Central Records System, computer databases, and the Criminal Justice Information Services' database to identify any derogatory information and prior arrest records. The FBI has 60 million names in its files. Almost 13,000 name checks were done for the Executive Office of the President for the President and associated offices in fiscal year 1993, and over 7,200 checks were done in fiscal year 1994. The processing time for this more extensive name check typically takes severa days, according to White House and FBI officials.

Step 2: Obtaining a Temporary Pass	Each new employee who is expected to work 90 days or more has 30 days from the date entered on duty to complete the sF-86, an FBI investigation consent form, a tax check waiver, and a personal data statement questionnaire (for employees of certain offices) and provide other personal data as needed. This 30-day standard was established by the White House on March 14, 1994. Employees not meeting this standard are to have their access to the White House revoked and are to be placed on leave without pay until the paperwork is completed. Prior to March 1994, there were no written standards for completing the sF-86.
	If the person has completed the sF-86 and related paperwork, the results of the initial name check are satisfactory, and the FBI name check has been submitted, the person is placed on the White House access list. This means the person must present positive identification each time he or she enters the White House complex. Prior to this time, the person is allowed into the complex only with an appointment and identification.
	After a satisfactory FBI name check is returned, the relevant Executive Office of the President security office recommends to the Secret Service that a temporary pass be issued to the employee for a period not to exceed 90 days, although 30-day extensions are allowed. The person is fingerprinted by the Secret Service, and the fingerprints are sent through the national database. Each new employee is required to attend a security briefing, and his or her attendance is documented. In the case of an extension, the Executive Office of the President requests the Secret Service to extend the temporary pass. After one extension, the Secret Service contacts the requesting office to provide a rationale for an additional extension, according to Service officials.
	The sF-86 forms from White House Office, Office of the Vice President, and Office of Policy Development staff go to the White House Counsel's office. A security officer in the Office of Administration reviews the sF-86s of individuals from the Office of Administration and the Office of National Drug Control Policy. According to White House officials, each sF-86 is reviewed to verify its correctness and completeness and to determine if any immediate issues need to be addressed.
Step 3: Obtaining a Permanent Pass	Before a permanent pass or a security clearance can be issued, the FBI, or some other agency, must conduct a full-field background investigation. The Executive Office of the President's request to the FBI for such an investigation includes the SF-86 and related documents.

FBI officials told us that their goal for first-time full-field background investigations was changed in late 1994 from 45 to 60 calendar days. An updated investigation, which is done every 5 years, has a goal of 90 days. According to FBI officials, these goals were changed before 1993 due to FBI staff shortages and an increased demand for investigations. The goals had been 35 calendar days for a first-time investigation and 75 days for a reinvestigation. FBI officials explained that the difference in goals is due to the urgency of completing first-time investigations. The FBI estimates that it conducts about 1,000 to 1,500 background investigations a year for the Executive Office of the President—about 25 percent of the FBI total.

According to FBI officials, if the investigation reveals information that warrants attention, the FBI notifies the White House Counsel's Office, the White House Office of Personnel Security, or the Security Office of the Executive Office of the President and might provide an interim report. At the completion of its investigation, the FBI sends an investigation summary to the appropriate reviewing office, which in turn forwards a copy to the Secret Service. Depending on the case, the FBI may also send copies of individual interview summaries but does not typically send the complete investigative file.

According to White House officials, once the reviewing office receives the FBI background investigation summary, its review process may involve a wide range of issues. Such issues may include prior arrests, credit problems, inability to verify previous employment, mistakes in paperwork, or employment suitability. The reviewing office determines any needed follow-up, such as contacting the subject for additional information or having the FBI investigate further. White House officials said that they rarely found it necessary to request a follow-up investigation.

White House officials stated they have several sources of information available to them during the review process, such as the FBI's background investigation report; the sF-86; the personal data statement provided by the employee (if applicable); the tax check results; financial disclosure information; and the National Crime Information Center check results. As information is returned from the agencies and departments, White House procedures, since March 1994, have required that it be reviewed within 5 days by the White House Counsel's office and the White House Personnel Security office. The decision to grant a permanent pass involves not just security concerns, but also suitability for continued employment, since the White House may decide, based on its review, not to permanently hire certain individuals. After the reviewing office has resolved any questions, the relevant security office in the Executive Office of the President sends a written request to the Secret Service for a permanent access pass for the employee. The Secret Service, if it agrees there is no danger to the President or other Service protectees, issues the permanent pass. According to White House and Secret Service officials, during the period of our review, the White House never directed the Secret Service to issue a pass in circumstances that it was otherwise reluctant to do.

According to White House officials, the process for obtaining a permanent pass is the same for a volunteer as for an employee or contractor. These officials said that most White House volunteers are citizens who perform duties related to correspondence and do not have permanent passes, but are allowed entry based on an access list and identification. However, they also said that there are about 80 volunteers who work in areas in which a temporary or permanent pass is more suitable for allowing them to carry out their responsibilities. For example, the current and most recent White House Counsel have accepted no salary.

Analysis of Key Event Time Intervals

We analyzed time intervals using both the complete, unadjusted database and an adjusted database that excluded the 54 individuals referred to in appendix I. Most of these individuals transferred from one position to another position within the Executive Office of the President.

White House, FBI, and Secret Service officials provided us with their explanations regarding the results of our analyses presented in this appendix and appendix IV. Our analyses did not include verifying the accuracy of the explanations.

Not all records were applicable to include in averaging the interval comparisons. Table III.1 shows the number of applicable and nonapplicable records by category. Records considered to be nonapplicable include those in which a person separated prior to one or more key event dates, action was not completed and therefore pending as of the closure date of the database, or action was taken in some other way, such as a person having a background investigation conducted by an agency other than the FBI. (Dates were not provided in these cases.)

Time Needed to Be Approved for a Permanent Pass

The processing time needed for an individual to be approved for a permanent White House access pass after entering on duty decreased from 1993 to 1994, as did most of the individual interval time frames leading up to final approval of a pass. As shown by table III.2, the average number of days it took to approve a permanent pass decreased from 1993 to 1994.

Only 2 permanent passes received final approval prior to September 20, 1993, and of the 400 staff entering on duty during 1993, 250 took over 300 days to be approved for permanent passes. Only 1 of 104 staff entering on duty in 1994 took over 300 days. White House officials attributed the longer processing times in 1993 to (1) operational and administrative inefficiencies and (2) the large volume of staff entering on duty in 1993. They said the time decreased in 1994 because (1) fewer people began work, (2) the White House corrected some inefficiencies in the process, (3) the White House Chief of Staff and Congress emphasized the pass process and established standards for it, (4) the White House began using computers to track the process, and (5) staff and officials became more experienced in the process.

With the passage of Public Law 103-329, an employee of the Executive Office of the President must be placed on leave without pay if the person has not, within 6 months of commencing employment or by October 31, 1994, whichever is later, had a background investigation, if completed, forwarded to the Secret Service for issuance of an access pass. Two individuals did not have a permanent pass request made within the required 6-month time period as of December 13, 1994—the last date covered by our analysis.¹ Six contractors also did not meet the legal deadline, but contractors were not considered to be subject to the law, according to White House officials.²

The following sections describe our analysis related to each time interval between the date a person entered on duty and the date the person was approved for a permanent pass. We also discuss key time intervals related to the drug test date. Although the White House does not consider the drug test to be part of the access pass process, we include information about the drug test date because our requesters asked that we analyze that data. The first step in obtaining a permanent pass is for the individual to complete the sF-86 and related paperwork. Table III.3 shows that the average number of days needed to complete the sF-86 after entering on duty decreased from 1993 to 1994.

¹According to White House officials, the first individual was a career employee with civil service protection whose background investigation was completed on November 5, 1994. According to the officials, proper administrative action was taken on November 18, 1994, to place the individual on leave without pay. The officials added that a background issue was subsequently resolved and a pass was issued to this person within 30 days of the administrative action. The second individual was a person who was waiting for Senate confirmation for a position with the Office of National Drug Control Policy and had requested that a permanent pass not be issued until confirmed by the Senate.

²According to White House officials, for purposes of administrative efficiency, contractors are now treated as if they were subject to P.L. 103-329. According to the officials, this change was made at some time after October 31, 1994, the effective date of the law.

	Three of 471 noncontractor employees who entered on duty prior to March 1, 1994, did not complete the sF-86 by March 18, 1994, as required. All 3 signed the sF-86 by March 30, 1994, but took 434 days, 432 days, and 35 days to do so from the date they entered on duty.
	Employees who entered on duty between March 1, 1994, and March 14, 1994, were required to complete the sF-86 by March 31, 1994. Two of six employees did not meet this requirement. Both signed the sF-86 by April 25, 1994. These two individuals took an average of 43 days from the date they entered on duty to complete the sF-86.
	Employees who entered on duty after March 14, 1994, were required to complete the SF-86 within 30 days of the date entered on duty. Six of 73 employees did not meet this requirement.
	 Five of the six were from the Office of National Drug Control Policy, and according to White House officials, the five cases involved administrative error. These five people signed their sF-86 an average of 60 days after entering on duty. Another entered on duty on May 16, 1994, and signed the sF-86 on June 28, 1994, an interval of 43 days. According to White House officials, it was known at the time of entry that this person was leaving White House employment. The person separated on October 2, 1994.
	With the passage of Public Law 103-329 in September 1994, Congress required that employees of the Executive Office of the President complete the sF-86 within 30 days of entering on duty or by October 31, 1994, whichever occurred later. None of the cases in our database are covered by this provision of the law. White House officials told us that they have complied with this provision.
Executive Office of the President Indicators	We analyzed two key event intervals that are the responsibility of the Executive Office of the President: (1) the time between when an SF-86 is signed and the Executive Office of the President forwards it to the FBI for a background investigation and (2) the time between when the FBI completes a background investigation and the Executive Office of the President recommends that a staff member receive a permanent pass.

Table III.4 shows that the average number of days needed for the Executive Office of the President to review submitted SF-86s for correctness and completeness before forwarding them to the FBI decreased from 1993 to 1994.

In 1993, the Executive Office of the President's review of SF-86s took over 100 days in 34 of 434 cases, and in 1994, it took over 100 days in only 2 of 155 cases. White House officials stated that the unfamiliarity of staff and reviewing officials with the information requirements of the SF-86 caused reviewing officials to request additional data, thus delaying the requests for FBI investigations.

Table III.5 shows that the average number of days for the Executive Office of the President to recommend approval of a permanent pass after receiving the FBI's investigative report decreased from 1993 to 1994.

During 1993, the Executive Office of the President took over 100 days to recommend the approval of a permanent pass in 202 of 294 cases, whereas in 1994, it took over 100 days in only 26 of 217 cases. According to White House officials, the longer times were attributable to waiting for information other than the background investigation, such as tax checks, and the decrease from 1993 to 1994 resulted from correcting procedural inefficiencies.

According to White House officials, this meant that applicants were not required to take drug tests prior to their appointments throughout much of 1993.

White House and congressional actions have established process changes and controls to improve the access pass and security clearance processes. For the time intervals and offices we reviewed, with few exceptions, the time intervals declined, and the procedures were adhered to. However, our observations indicate a potential for strengthening controls in several selected areas, particularly at the start of a new administration. The areas related to renewing temporary passes, revoking passes after separation, and granting security clearances. The scope of our work did not address whether problems occurred as a result of the potential control weaknesses. While we did not identify specific problems, we believe it is appropriate to consider improving these controls.

Temporary Pass Issuance Data

Table IV.1: Average Days From theDate Entered on Duty to the Date aTemporary Pass Was Issued

Table IV.1 shows that the average number of days needed for an individual to be issued a temporary pass after entering on duty decreased from 1993 to 1994.

^aThe individuals who entered on duty in 1994, on average, received a temporary pass 26 days prior to entering on duty. (See app. I for an explanation of how steps can occur in a different order, resulting in negative numbers.)

Temporary passes allow individuals access to the White House complex while waiting for a permanent pass. Although, since March 14, 1994, individuals should have completed the sF-86 (and other tasks) prior to obtaining a temporary pass, some did not. Temporary passes are initially issued for a period of 90 days and can be extended. A number of extensions were granted. Individuals held these passes for an average of 341 days in 1993 and 110 days in 1994 before being approved for a permanent pass.

SF-86 Often NotSince March 14, 1994, an individual has been expected to have an sF-86Completed Prior tocompleted before receiving a temporary pass. Of the 439 individuals whoTemporary Pass Issuancesigned their sF-86 in 1993, 310 (71 percent) received a temporary pass priorto signing the sF-86. White House officials told us that in the early days of the administration individuals were not required to complete an SF-86 before receiving a temporary pass.

Our analysis of the database indicates that two noncontractors were issued temporary passes after March 14, 1994, even though they had not yet submitted an sF-86. White House officials said that these individuals had both been interns and had a prior sF-86 on file, which had not been reflected in the database. Ten contractor employees were also issued temporary passes after March 14, 1994, even though they had not yet submitted an sF-86. White House officials said that Office of Administration policy at that time was to not process the sF-86 for contractors until after they had concluded a probationary period. The officials stated that this is no longer the policy.

Overall average	293	294

In 1993, 361 of 398 individuals took 200 days or more to be approved for a permanent pass, whereas in 1994, only 5 of 104 individuals receiving temporary passes took 200 days or more to be approved for a permanent pass. White House officials attributed the decrease from 1993 to 1994 to changes in the processing procedures.

Our discussions with Secret Service officials and our analyses indicated that during the longer processing times in 1993, the Service routinely granted eight or more extensions to individuals for temporary passes as requested by the Executive Office of the President. In commenting on a draft of this report, Secret Service officials stated that during the initial transitions of administrations it was normal to have more frequent extensions.

In addition, as of December 13, 1994, the cutoff date for our analysis, 22 individuals, including 10 contractors, were employed but had not been approved for a permanent pass. Two had not received a temporary pass, and the other 20 held a temporary pass an average of 132 days, as of the cutoff date. Of 15 who held temporary passes more than 90 days, 3 had permanent passes recommended by the Executive Office of the President but not yet approved by the Secret Service and had waited 37 days on average since the Executive Office of the President recommendation; 3 had background investigations completed for an average of 58 days since the completion; and 9 were still undergoing their background investigations for an average of 57 days.

	Given the potential for repeated temporary pass extensions, consideration should be given to strengthening controls in this area.
Data Related to Staff Separations	Out of the database of 638 records, 188 (29 percent) indicate that the individuals have separated from the office or contractor position shown in the database. The individuals left at various stages in the process of obtaining a permanent pass or security clearance. Once an individual leaves Executive Office of the President employment, according to White House officials, there are procedures to ensure that the individual turns in the pass. However, the Secret Service has no means of verifying an individual's employment status and continued need for a permanent pass. Attention to stengthening controls in this area would be appropriate. We examined documents related to these procedures, but did not independently verify whether permanent passes were voided or returned in these cases.
Individuals Have Left at Various Stages of the Access Pass and Security Clearance Process	Of the 188 records that indicate separation, 7 individuals moved from one office within the Executive Office of the President to another office. Four additional records concern two individuals who moved from one office within the Executive Office of the President to another office, and then left the second office. Thus, both individuals show two departure dates in the database. The other 177 records are for people who left the Executive Office of the President.
	All seven individuals who are now with a second office within the Executive Office of the President were approved for a permanent pass either with the first office or the second office. All received a temporary pass.

Of the two individuals who worked for and separated from two offices, one was approved for a permanent pass while with the second office. The other individual had a background investigation conducted while at the second office and left this position 13 days after the background investigation was completed. A permanent pass has not been recommended or approved. Both individuals received a temporary pass.

Of the other 177 people who separated from the Executive Office of the President,

- 67 were approved by the Secret Service for a permanent pass;
- 17 were recommended by the Executive Office of the President for a permanent pass, which was never approved by the Secret Service;
- 43 had a completed background investigation, but were never recommended for a permanent pass;
- 21 had a background investigation initiated, but never completed; and
- 29 separated without the FBI initiating a background investigation.

Concerning this data, White House officials said that in the overwhelming majority of instances, the departure was unrelated to the pass process. The officials also said that, for example, the fact that an individual left after the background investigation was completed, but before a recommendation for a pass was made does not suggest that something in the background investigation precipitated the departure. The officials said that similarly, the fact that an individual departed after the Executive Office of the President recommended issuance of a pass, but before the Secret Service approved the pass does not imply that the individual left because the Secret Service declined to approve the pass. The officials concluded by saying that as a general proposition, a detailed exposition of the relationship between departure dates and various steps in the pass process suggests a correlation that bears no relationship with reality.

Sixty-seven people were approved for a permanent pass.

• Seven were approved an average of 186 days after they had departed. In five of these cases, according to White House officials, the person went to another government agency but continued to need access to the White House. Another case involves a person who came back to the White House as a detailee from another agency. We do not have information on the seventh person.

• Sixty left an average of 125 days after a permanent pass had been approved by the Secret Service. We do not have information on how many returned the pass after departure.

Seventeen people had a permanent pass recommended but never approved.

- Six had a permanent pass recommended after they left. One person, according to White House officials, left the Office of Policy Development but was expected to return in some capacity. We do not have information on the other five individuals. These six individuals separated an average of 44 days before the permanent pass was recommended.
- Eleven left an average of 93 days after a permanent pass had been recommended.

The FBI completed the background investigation for 43 people who never had a permanent pass recommended.

- Five had an FBI background investigation initiated and completed after they departed. White House officials told us that the background investigation was done in three cases because the individuals needed a pass in some other capacity—one as a White House detailee, one as a White House volunteer, and one as an employee of another government agency. We do not have information on the other two individuals. These five individuals left an average of 164 days before the background investigation had been completed.
- Thirty-three departed an average of 106 days after a background investigation had been completed.
- Five had a background investigation initiated before they departed and completed after they departed. These individuals left an average of 23 days before the completion of the background investigation.

Out of the 177 who separated, 171 had temporary passes at the time of separation and had held the temporary pass for an average of 266 days prior to departure. Four individuals received temporary passes an average of 36 days after their separation, and two never received a temporary pass.

Permanent Pass Revocation Procedure

According to a Secret Service official, the agency depends on each office of the Executive Office of the President to notify the Service if an individual is no longer employed and thus no longer needs a permanent pass. Without this notification, the Secret Service has no way of knowing who continues to need access.

	White House officials stated that they maintain a checkout procedure for employees who leave Executive Office of the President employment, and unless the White House allows continued access, the employee must surrender his or her access pass upon separation. The White House provided us with a document supporting these procedures. According to a White House official, this process is checked by regular reviews of attrition and accession lists of White House pass holders. The official also said that White House pass holder lists are frequently updated.
Access to Classified Security Information	The White House allows employees with permanent White House passes and a need-to-know to have access to classified information up to the top secret level. Generally, executive branch agencies are required by executive order to follow uniform governmentwide procedures and apply specific criteria when granting security clearances to individuals. Executive branch agencies grant security clearances under Executive Order 10450, as amended, and at the time of our review, handled classified data under Executive Order 12356, which was revoked and replaced by Executive Order 12958 on April 17, 1995. ¹ According to White House officials, the White House Office, the Office of the Vice President, and the Office of Policy Development are not subject to the requirements of Executive Order 10450 but nevertheless use the same procedures and criteria to issue the passes that give employees access to classified information on a need-to-know basis.
	As of December 1994, 381 of 638 records in the database indicate that the person had been authorized access to classified information. These included 359 staff assigned to the White House Office, the Office of the Vice President, and the Office of Policy Development who have access to classified information on a need-to-know basis by holding a permanent White House pass. An additional 22 records indicate staff assigned to the Office of Administration and the Office of National Drug Control Policy who have security clearances granted under governmentwide procedures. The first of the permanent White House passes was not approved until September 30, 1993, and the first of the 22 Office of Administration and ¹These orders establish uniform requirements for personnel security programs in the federal government. A security clearance is a certification that an individual who requires access to information classified at a certain level has been found eligible and may be permitted access to classified information.

Office of National Drug Control Policy security clearances was not granted until June 22, 1993.² We requested data on how the offices conducted business during these 8- and 5-month periods before security clearances were granted. White House officials stated that interim clearances were provided to about two dozen senior staff during this time. The officials further stated that, for reasons of confidentiality, data on the specific cases was not provided to us. They also said that the overwhelming majority of the classified work done in the Executive Office of the President is done by staff of the National Security Council, which is not one of the offices represented in the data we analyzed.

Given that future administrations may face similar circumstances during the first few months in office, consideration should be given to strengthening controls in this area.

²In addition, one individual had a clearance at the time entered on duty.

Comments From the Federal Bureau of Investigation

U.S. Department of Justice Federal Bureau of Investigation Washington, D. C. 20535 September 1, 1995 Mr. R. Bruce Brown National Security and International Affairs Division General Accounting Office 441 G Street, N.W. Washington, D.C. Dear Mr. Brown: This is a follow-up to your August 31 conversation with Mrs. Margaret Tremblay, of my staff, concerning Job Code 709077, a review of procedures and practices regarding the issuance of White House access passes and security clearances. After consultation with appropriate FBI personnel, it was determined that a correction was necessary to clarify a portion of information appearing on page 31 of the draft report prepared for this review. At your suggestion, Mrs. Tremblay contacted your associate, Mr. David Hand, on August 31, and communicated the requested change to him. Mr. Hand was asked to delete line 17 from page 31, "Unfavorable information sometimes..." and to replace it with "Issues and/or additional information was identified which needed to be addressed." Additional information could include addresses, jobs, associates, and/or training, not contained in the original application, but which were identified during the course of the background investigation. Thank you for the opportunity to review the draft report. Sincerely yours, Winyn H. Ch. Swanson D. Carter Acting Deputy Chief Office of Public and Congressional Affairs 1 - Ms. Vickie L.
